The change in plan is due to the efforts of D. E. Metzger, superintendent of the work, who, when Major Wooten deemed it unsafe to extend the core of comparatively small rock more than 300 feet, and stopped the work, hurried to Philadelphia and Washington to consult with his principles and obtain, if possible, more lenient terms.

The hitch on the Hilo breakwater job has been caused by the lack of is called for by the specifications for the sea slope, and three ton for the barbor slope and cap. The quarry on which the contractors counted to supply this heavy material did not block out as expected, and work came to a
